

Some electoral districts in New South Wales have changed

The 2023 NSW State election will be held on Saturday, 25 March.
Voting is compulsory.

Ahead of the election, some of the electoral districts (also called electorates) have changed. Some electoral districts have:

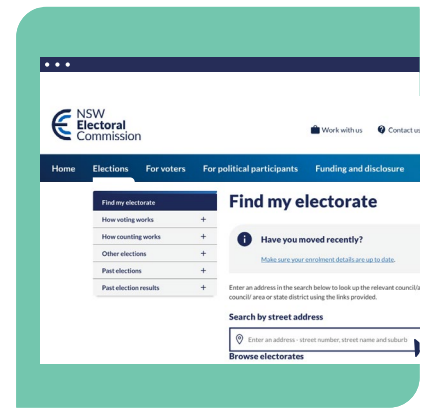

- changed name
- changed boundaries
- been removed and split into other districts, or
- been newly created.

This could mean that the electoral district you are enrolled to vote in has changed, even if your address has not.

Why have electoral districts changed?

Over time, the population changes and people move in and out of electoral districts. Electoral districts are reviewed to make sure that all electoral districts across New South Wales have approximately the same number of electors. This gives the people of New South Wales equal representation in Parliament. This review process is called redistribution and is a requirement of the Constitution Act 1902.

How can I find out if my district has changed?

Before you get ready to vote, find out if your electoral district has changed by using the Find my electorate tool on our website at elections.nsw.gov.au

Enter your enrolled address and click 'Find'. Your state electoral district will display on screen. Then click through to read information about your enrolled electoral district including where you can vote.

The electoral district you are enrolled in determines the candidates you can vote for at the upcoming 2023 NSW State election.

Remember, if you move address or change your name, it is your responsibility to keep your enrolment up to date.
